Conference Paper Tracks

Track One:

Climate Crisis - Management in the Anthropocene

Track Two:

Inequality - Managing the Convergence

Track Three:

Actors - Politics,
Business & Management

Track One: Climate Crisis - Management in the Anthropocene

Keywords: climate crisis, Anthropocene, business as usual, irreversibility, irrecoverable loss, tipping points, thresholds, planetary shifts, point of no return, climate migrations, climate justice, carbon budgets, humanistic management in the Anthropocene, culture management (culture, heritage, memory, arts, tourism, participation, inclusiveness, audience development, community) in the Anthropocene, media management (social media, fake news, alternative facts, agenda-setting, identity media, filter bubbles, media dualism) in the Anthropocene, climate crisis and cooperative competition (solidarity, cooperation, competition, coopetition)

The Anthropocene is a proposed geological epoch of significant human impact on (among others) earth's ecosystems, including anthropogenic climate changes and global warming, expected to change the social organization of our reality during the life of generations now living. Short term interests of corporate giants and sadly many politicians make impossible addressing the problems, even though the resolutions already exist (IPCC reports recommendations). Socially and humanistically responsible radical decisions made by conscious managers are key answers to the problem, but the question is how to raise the awareness for widespread solidary actions and in what way can common good (the planet) be a motivation in the world of competition.

Track Two: Inequality – Managing the Convergence

Keywords: inequalities, 99%, redistribution, capital accumulation, poverty, income, wealth, global tax, humanistic management and inequalities, culture management (culture, heritage, memory, arts, tourism, participation, inclusiveness, audience development, community) and inequalities, media management (social media, fake news, alternative facts, agenda-setting, identity media, filter bubbles, media dualism) and inequalities, inequalities and cooperative competition (solidarity, cooperation, competition, coopetition)

Inequality in most societies is at the levels met only before revolutions and violent conflict. Companies seeking ever greater profit and the partial dependency of politicians on businesses effectively reduce opportunities for political action based on solidarity (e.g. measures aiming at fair distribution). Despite unprecedented levels of wealth accumulated globally today we are struggling as a global community to find innovative ways of distributing that wealth in ways that allow for a dignified life for all. Can humanistic management contribute to tackling inequality and if so how?

Track Three: Actors - Politics, Business & Management

Keywords: business-politics relations pathologies, business impact on politics, politics impact on business, business and democracy crisis, renaissance of nationalism and business, isolationism and intolerance (refugee crisis) and business, abuse of power in business and politics, populism and business, political and marketing manipulations and sociotechnics, business-politics relations and humanistic management, business-politics relations and culture management (culture, heritage, memory, arts, tourism, participation, inclusiveness, audience development, community), business-politics relations and media management (social media, fake news, alternative facts, agenda-setting, identity media, filter bubbles, media dualism), business-politics relations and cooperative competition (solidarity, cooperation, competition, coopetition)

What can and what should politics, business and management do individually and collectively to nourish acts of solidarity and strengthen their positive impact on the common good. How can these actors collaborate and innovate to co-create solutions for the challenges we face as a global community? Overcoming strong populist movements that have surged in worrisome ways all over the world is a prerequisite thereof and simplistic explanations of the rise of populism fall just as short as the simplistic solutions populists promise to complex problems. So what is the role of the relationship between politics, business and management on the rise of populism, how can this relationship contribute to overcoming it and how can actors be motivated to act with solidarity?
